Conservation And Unemployment

Since the advent of the great depression and drought era, now nearing its tenth birthday, citizens of the west have become more conscious of the value of trees and of their importance, value and place in the economic life value of trees and of their importance, value and place in the economic life of the country.

During this decade of trial and tribulation, residents of the prairies and observed that while treed areas have not escaped the ravages of drought, the effects of drought have been somewhat ameliorated in areas plentifully supplied with tree growth. This is mainly due to the moisture conservation power of trees in their relation to contiguous land, partly due to their ability to prevent or halt erosion and to some extent attributable to the fact that such districts by their very nature lend themselves more readily to agricultural diversification.

As a result of these observations prairie residents have become more reconscious than they were in the days prior to 1929 and This aroused interest is reflected in the increased attendance at lectures delivered during the annual migrations of the Dominion government's forestry and tree planting railway cars and in the keen interest which has developed in the work being done under the Prairle Farm Rehabilitation Act and by other organizations devoted to conservation-work in various forms.

The public conscience having thus been aroused to the importance, may the necessity of conservation of moisture, it would appear that the time sarrived when very general support would be given to any worthwhile projects which the governments of the country, both federal and provincial, might be prepared to undertake, with the dual objective of conservation of moisture through afforestation and reforestation and at least a partial solution of the unemployment problem. To the extent to which these two problems could be dealt with under a common project would hearty support be forthcoming for such a scheme or series of undertakings.

In the Right Direction

Just recently it was announced by the P.F.R.A. administration that all tis newly created community pastures in Saskatchewan, totalling approximately 600,000 acres are to be created game preserves and that custodians of these areas are to be given special training in game conservation as part of a program in which the provincial government, the P.F.R.A. administration and Ducks Unlimited will co-operate.

The idea seems to be an excellent one, but it might well be further extended to include a substantial program of tree planting in those community pastures where conditions lend themselves to such a project, thus widening the moisture conservation sphere of influence to adjoining farm lands and providing work as a substitute for direct relief for many now on the relief roles.

lands and providing work as a substitute for direct relief for many now on the relief rolls.

Such work, however, need not and should not be confined to areas set aside primarily as community pastures and game preserves. It could and should be extended to Dominion and provincial parks and wasteland areas, some of which might appropriately be developed as playgrounds and tourist resorts affording a great deal of useful and valuable work for many may illed and creating assets which would uitlimately ensure some return to the country for the money thus expended. Coupled with the planting of treeless areas could well be the improvement of districts of existing natural growth.

Of Wide Value

Of Wide Value

Apart altogether from its value to agriculture in the field of moisture conservation an active and well thought out forestry program as exemplified by new plantings and improvement, preservation and care of existing plantations and of natural growth, would have an intrinsic value of great importance in the industrial and economic life of the country.

This was portinently pointed out in the brief submitted last year to the Rowell Commission on Dominion-provincial relations by the Foundation of Ontario Naturalists in support of their contention that the Federal government should take over provincial natural resources or alternatively should ald the provinces in developing and conserving them, in the following words:

should aid the provinces in developing and conserving them, in the to-ing words:

"The general prosperity of the Canadian people and Canadian bush no matter in what province, both as sources of taxation and conversel; possible recipients of relief, is of vital concern to the Federal government is axiomatic.
"How important, therefore, that the Federal government should possible recipients of reited, is of vala dotted to the recens government should be concerned that raw materials be available for the construction and building industries, for packages, boxes, barrels, etc., of all kinds for shipping Canadian produce to home and foreign markets, to ralivarys, telephone and telegraph companies for ties, poles and posts and rolling stock, to mines for props and other construction work, to factories for the manufacture of furniture, radios, tools, implements and the hundreds of other things too numerous to mention, for fuel and the many uses on the farm."

And again the same organization pointed out that: "There is the possibility of employing relief recipients on forest improvement work, such as the building of roads, trails, fire lines, brush disposal, improving and creating tourist camp sites and conveniences, etc., etc. There still remains a tremendous amount of such work to be done:"

Then why not use some of the millions being spent on relief to do some of the work and give work to those who have none?

Hinteen hundred years ago, during the Tang Dynasty, a thy Szechwanese singsong girl committed suicide because love had passed her by.
Behind her, according to the old beauty.

The girl, Hsush Tao, did not write poems of love, but only of encouragement, urging her admirers to seek greater knowledge or wiser methods of administration. She marked all her poems with a drop of water which spread into the form of a peach blossom. This peach blossom watermark is still carried none of Shanghai's most popular brands of writing paper—the Hsuch Tao—which is noted for its delicate texture.

Recently, during a visit to the girl's shrine at Wang Chiang Lou, where she drew the water for making flowers on the writing paper, some Chinese girls conceived the idea of writing to their husbands and sweethearts at the front on peach-blossom paper. Hundreds of the cancel and water-marked messages were dispatched from Chengtu, on each of which was written a verse of encouragement. eauty. The girl, Hsuch Tao, did not write

To The Dominion Government. Representatives of 11 flying schools operated on a commercial basis offeried their facilities to the Dominion government to aid in setting up a reserve of air pilots for Canada. In interviews with Gol. V. I. Smart, deputy minister of transport, and Major-Gen. L. R. LaFleche, deputy minister of national defence, the flying schools delegation pointed out that many young men desired to learn to fly but were unable to afford it. They suggested the government provide some financial aid for aspiring pilots. Consideration was promised for the flying schools' suggestion of a student pilot subsidy for 10 hours dual instruction and the first 50 hours solo flying.

In 1938 the flying schools turned out 12s private pilots qualified for sportsman flying, 20 commercial pilots licensed to dy aircraft for hire, and six air engineers or nireraft and worker weighteness or nireraft and worker weighteness or mireraft and worker weighteness.
